

Our collective commitment to change

as stated in the generational vision of Thriving Families 2025 – 2045

We see too many South Australian families facing barriers and becoming vulnerable when they get trapped in cycles of trauma, disadvantage, and adversity. One of the most acute expressions of this is in the child protection system.

Realising meaningful change will take targeted and sustained effort over time – it will take a new approach to designing and delivering a service system that empowers people to exercise choice, control and cultural authority over decisions that affect them and their family.

No single government or service can be the solution; a collective approach is needed.

We are all responsible for improving outcomes for children, young people, and families in South Australia.

We want to ensure future generations are supported to thrive and are empowered to find what they need – within themselves, their families, their communities and in the services they access.

We are committed to working together in a concerted effort with government to making this change occur within a generation.

We are ready to work together as a collective to co-design, co-implement and co-evaluate priorities alongside people with lived experience and Aboriginal communities.

We pledge to work together, to do things differently in order to do things better.
